Subject: Microsoft Settlement

Isn't it time to really make Microsoft pay for their anti-competitive actions? Something that will have real meaning to them. From what I've read, and going by Microsofts past behaviors in various actions, the proposed settlement is completely inadequate. One might even call it a reward. I especially liked the class action suit where they were proposing giving software and machines to the schools. Oh my, what a terrible punishment, to be legally forced to break into the schools venue and start to displace Macs. Again and again, they have circumvented court orders and continued to proliferate by using illegal anti-competitive action. Please do something to stop them, not reward them. I personally believe that the only way is to split them. If it was good enough for old Ma Bell, it should be good enough for Microsoft. Look at all the competition/business opportunities that created. All the new businesses and opportunities created. The same could hold true here. Isn't it time to help boost the economy?
